I had only 3 other countries in the list so I think the limitations are well justified by the application's goals.Q: React Native: What is a modern project structure for component-based UI? I'm using create-react-native-app to create an app that consists of many components. What is a good project structure for this kind of app? What about top-level libs that can be used for different components? For example, if the app has an async action like Sign in, should I split it into a library that can be re-used in other projects? I guess a similar question would be what is a modern Ux structure that can be re-used for other projects. Thanks for any ideas! A: What I am currently using is: App is wrapped around App.js (implements createApp(), render(), and static getDerivedStateFromProps() in the constructor) Components are split into: App, Form, Content, Admin (these are section components, i.e. content is splitted into a header, content, footer and admin into header, content, footer, and admin with the admin component requiring a parent component to use it) All this is implemented in the official react-native-elements example. This works for me, but I don't know of anyone else who has tried this out in a production app. Main Content Yorkshire Outdoors - A&E Specialists At Yorkshire Outdoors we provide a wide range of First Aid and outdoor skills courses.
